

The Sea

for Lucy, by request

Martin Robertson

The land stoops to the sea.
Cliff, rock, sand, pebble beach, yielding or hard throw back the wild inconstant water that cries against the shore.
Yet that sea shall endure its round of calm and storm when all we see of land shall cease to be, or change its nature, structure, form.

Within this same salt tide the other end of time saw life begin.
Beetle and man, grass and cedar, climbed to complexity from cells formed in the sea —elementals that float on past (they the same) eel, dolphin, weed, coral, as when all seas were theirs alone.

Its temperate depth sustains the coelacanth unchanged from years ere light, that falls now caught in the wide dew-pond of Mount Palomar, leapt from some galaxy, far past the faint nebula remotest ranged within our sense behind the jewels of Andromeda.

Andromeda, who naked chained on a sea-rock, waited out of the wave a monstrous love
—but her wind-woer struck him to a stone humped in the tides, gull-lone, gull-tenanted, and soon gull-dropping-white on the myth-dark sea; that is yet this sea, moved by this moon.

By moon-heaped ocean, strait and firth where the tides race, Leif Ericsson, Magellan, one seeking a golden fleece, a white whale, legend and life, by sail or steam or dream driven, criss-cross the seas.
The sea remains indifferent, inviolate.
